DON'T PLAY FOR TONS AND THAT'S WHY I CROSS IT MORE

I love playing under pressure. In fact, if there's no pressure, then I'm not in the perfect zone

www.newindianexpress.com

Think less about an impending three-figure mark and it might mean that you will reach the milestone more often than not, is India captain Virat Kohli's mantra while batting. Kohli currently is jointly second highest in terms of century with 30 tons to his credit in 50-overs along with Ricky Ponting. Sachin Tendulkar tops the list with 49 hundreds.

Asked if these staggering numbers that he has racked up over the years, play on his mind, he replied: "I don't play for the three-figure mark, maybe that's why I end up crossing it more. Because I am not thinking about it. So I don't put myself under pressure in terms of I need to achieve a landmark. For me, what's most important is to win the match for the team. Even if I am 98 not out or 99 not out, I don't mind, as long as I win the game. In that process, things end up happening because you want to stay till the end. So my motivation has never been that, it will never be that."

The skipper stressed that his philosophy will always remain as long as he plays top flight cricket. "Whatever time I play, 8 years, 10 years or 12 years whatever it is, I will never think of that because it just doesn't come to me naturally. For me, what's most important is how I can help the team win with the bat in the field, giving my 120 per cent every time I step on to the field and preparing accordingly that I think is more important to me than the personal landmark," he said.

Summary

Virat Kohli notched up his 30th One-Day international century against Sri Lanka in the fifth game of the series at the R Premadasa Stadium in Colombo on 3rd September 2017. With the landmark, Kohli is now joint-second with Ricky Ponting on the list of most ODI hundreds behind Sachin Tendulkar (49). Virender Sehwag, the former Indian batsman has backed Kohli to surpass Sachin Tendulkar's records.

Key Learnings

- Performing under pressure: Virat Kohli relishes to perform under pressure. The fact that he has broken Sachin's Tendulkar record of 17 ODI Hundreds while chasing in 102 innings speaks about his composure, approach and the drive the to achieve success. Performing under pressure is not easy when you have deadlines, targets and milestones to achieve. Think of it as a challenge to deliver when you're under the pump and just focus on the task at hand rather than the outcome.

- Being a team player: Virat Kohli doesn't mind if he is unable to complete his hundred in ODI matches so long as it helps the team to achieve a formidable target or to anchor a successful run chase. As captain, he is leading by example, not caring about personal landmarks but the overall success of the team. As a team player, you need to have an overall view of how your contribution can help the team to achieve their results and lead by example thinking how your efforts will benefit the team.

- Giving more than your 100%: Virat Kohli, being captain of the Indian cricket team gives more than his 100% while performing on the field. Be his batting, fielding or even by taking unpopular decisions while selecting his team, he always performs at his peak levels and as a result Team India has lost just 3 times in all competitive games from the start of 2017. It does not matter in whichever field you belong to, you should always try to perform at your peak capacity and give all your efforts. The results will come in a matter of time.

Wellness

By the time he was in his early 30s, Gagan Banga, chief executive officer (CEO) of Indiabulls Housing Finance Ltd at the time, was already a runner. Running used to be his meditation—and still is. He started running in his early 30s and now has finished a handful of marathons in under 4 hours and half marathons in under 100 minutes. Since Indiabulls offices are spread across the country, he has to travel a fair bit. And among the first things he packs is a pair of running shoes, often going for a run wherever work takes him. Several Indiabulls employees across the country have emulated their boss, with many joining him on his runs when he is in their city.

Edited excerpts from an interview:

1) Does running influence your work performance?

Running is of huge help; it clears my head early in the morning and allows me to think clearly, cutting out the emotions of the previous workday. It also leaves me with a lot of energy, allowing me to get the maximum out of my workday.

2) How does leading by example as a fit leader influence your team members?

My colleagues know that I have a lot of energy and they won't find me physically exhausted at 7.30pm. They also know that I value time management and deadlines, which is a takeaway from running. Most importantly, they know that I deeply value loyalty and to come up that curve, longevity is very important. That fit professionals will be able to contribute for a longer period is a belief well appreciated at Indiabulls.

3) Comment on the leadership lessons you could get from distance running.

I generally train for long distances in a group and, over time, the virtue of teamwork and support is my biggest learning. Running is generally perceived as an individual sport, but without the mentorship of my coach and support of my fellow runners, I would never be able to abide by the training regimen required to even be an average long-distance runner.

4) In a perfect world, how would you incorporate running / fitness in the workday of your team members?

I would love to see people hit the gym or run before they come to work. I sincerely wish it was mandatory for all, and people would be marked absent if they had not worked out at least four-five days per week. In a perfect world, there would, perhaps, be a widespread understanding that working out is as much, if not more, about mental health as it is about physical health.

5) How, when and why did you start running?

I had to undergo a minor operation in 2005 and the pre-operation blood report opened my eyes. As a 31-year-old, I was suffering from very high cholesterol levels. That got me into doing cardio workouts. I moved from running on the roads to treadmill running, and resumed running on the road by 2006—it has been nine years of road running since then.

6) Describe your training regimen.

From mid-June to October, I run three-four days a week. On Sundays, I do 2 hours, Mondays, a recovery run, Wednesdays are for Interval Training and Fridays, a 90-minute run. From October-January, I run four days a week, with Fridays reserved for 2-hour runs and Sundays, for 3 to three-and-a-half hours of running. I also do strength training in the gym through the year, but rather than lifting heavy weights, I focus on functional training involving the core. From February-June, my running dips and I focus more on playing tennis and working out at the gym.

Summary

Gagan Banga, Vice Chairman and Managing Director of Indiabulls, started running because he had to choose between life-threateningly high cholesterol levels and exercise at the young age of 31. When he started out as a treadmill runner in the gym, he struggled to get through a few hundred metres and would get breathless quickly. But he stuck to it, graduating from a few hundred metres to running several kilometres, both on the treadmill and on the open road. He has also motivated his peers and employees to take up running in order to lead a healthy life.

Key Learnings

- Health is wealth: Gagan Banga suffered from high cholesterol levels at the age of 31. Thus, he took it upon himself to start doing exercises in the form of cardio and running. Due to the extremely fast and stressful environments we live in, many individuals suffer from health problems in their late 20's and early 30's. Thus, it is necessary to develop a habit to indulge in some form of exercise or any sport on a weekly basis that can keep us fit and fine.

- Being a fit leader: Even if the office time extends beyond the official working hours, Gagan Banga is still active and remains productive. Staying fit will not only impact your personal life, but on the professional front, you'll be much more productive and will be able to contribute much more to your organization. The time spent on recuperating from illness will be a lot less and you'll be able to give that much more time to your professional as well as personal life.

- Teamwork: Gagan Banga relies on the support of his colleagues and his coach in order to stick to his training regimen. It is necessary to find and establish a relationship with people who have common interest in any activity relating to fitness like gymming, running, swimming or any sports. This enables the group to establish a schedule which the entire group can adhere to, motivate each other and achieve a common objective of staying fit

"The idea was to make small hotels, bed-and- breakfasts and inns more accessible to travellers."

Entrepreneurship can't be taught in college. Not at least to Ritesh Agarwal, the 23-year-old founder of OYO Rooms, India's largest branded network of budget hotels. For him, it all comes from within. One would have read the signs when, at 13, this boy from small-town Odisha began to make money by selling SIM cards. Four years later, he dropped out of college to take the entrepreneurial plunge. "I always wanted to be an entrepreneur," recalls Agarwal.

In 2009, Agarwal moved to Kota and was preparing for his engineering entrance exam. But that took a back seat after he attended the TiE Global Summit in Delhi; thereafter he would take an overnight train from Kota to Delhi almost every weekend to understand the entrepreneurial ecosystem in India. In 2012, at 18, he launched Oravel Stays, a website designed to enable listing and booking of budget accommodation. After setting up Oravel Stays, Agarwal travelled for over three months and stayed in over 100 bed-and-breakfasts, guest houses and small hotels. "The real problem for the traveller was not lack of awareness, but lack of trust. If you were lucky, you would end up having a comfortable stay. Otherwise, the issues could range from poor quality bed linen, dirty washrooms to even disinterested or rude staff," he says. It was this realisation that got him to pivot Oravel to OYO in 2013. It partners with hotels to standardise rooms to give travellers a similar experience across cities. OYO not only lends its name, but also trains in-house staff to ensure uniformity of services in return for a 20 percent commission on booking value.

"In many emerging markets, including India, there are significant trust deficits which have to be overcome, especially in the sharing or person-to-person economy. With OYO, Ritesh pioneered a business model that standardised short-stay accommodation to offer customers a predictable and affordable experience," says Bejul Somaia, managing director at Lightspeed Venture Partners, a venture capital fund that invested an undisclosed amount in the startup in 2014. Its other investors include Sequoia Capital, Greenoaks Capital Partners and Japan's SoftBank Group.

What is Agarwal's secret? "I was never scared to take any risks," says the youngest of four siblings. "As long as 75 percent of the children for my parents were okay, I didn't matter I thought." His parents won't have much to complain, though. For, their youngest kid is doing much more than okay.

Summary

Ritesh Agarwal, at the age of 23 is the CEO of OYO rooms. It is the fastest growing branded network of hotels offline and online in India. It provides travellers with good, affordable hotel rooms that have the basic amenities. Its network currently spans over 200 Indian cities including all major metros, regional commercial hubs, leisure destinations, and key pilgrimage towns. The company's vision is to become the most preferred and trusted hotel brand in the world.

Key Learnings

- Root Cause Analysis - Ritesh Agarwal always aspired to be an entrepreneur and thus he came with the idea of budget accommodation for travellers. He first understood the Indian entrepreneurial ecosystem and later, travelled extensively and stayed in a number of guest houses and small hotels. Thus before launching OYO, he did a thorough analysis of the problems faced by the average traveller looking for accommodation at affordable prices. For an entrepreneur, it is very important to first understand the problem at hand, do an extensive analysis on it before coming up with an innovative solution that will launch his/her entrepreneurial career

- Being passionate for what you want to do - Ritesh Agarwal had no fancy MBA degree from a top business school. He just aspired to become an entrepreneur. After careful analysis of the budget accommodation scenario in India, he came up with Oravel which turned into OYO. After experiencing the troubles of frequent travellers, he ensured uniformity of services across all the hotels associated with OYO. OYO has now more than 7000 hotels in over 200 cities. All this he was able to achieve at the age of 23. Thus, in order to achieve what you truly desire for, age or education is secondary. Passion and commitment are of utmost importance

Where you won't learn sales is at a university, even in programs called "entrepreneurship."

There are lots of ideas out there about what it takes to start a great business, and lots of people who are willing to teach you entrepreneurship. But can high-paid employees teach entrepreneurship? For example, instructors of the Miami Dade College entrepreneurship program include Adriana Cisneros, CEO of Cisneros; Francesca de Quesada Covey, Head of Platform Partnerships for Facebook in Latin America and other key executives of the top organizations.

I'm sure they are all very nice and accomplished people who can teach the students at Miami Dade College a lot about how to manage a business—but I'm not so sure they can teach them how to start one. For the most part, they are all high-paid employees. And high-paid employees have a very different mind-set than an entrepreneur.

The missing key

The topics that the students will be covering are all theoretical in nature. But one of the key aspect is missing and that is Sales. It's my belief that the number one predictor of the success of an entrepreneur is his or her ability to sell. I'm not talking just about the ability to sell a product but about the ability to sell a vision, a team, yourself, and potential partners and deals.

Growing your team through sales

Any company that wants to scale and become successful needs to have the best players on the team. As you grow, you can't possibly direct all areas of the company from marketing to accounting to product development. You need to find the best people to run those areas of the company for you. To attract them, you must sell them. Sell them on the mission and vision of your company. Sell them on the product roadmap you have. These best employees have many options, so you have to stand out in a crowd.

Getting investors through sales

When it comes to building a successful business, you must have access to Other People's Money, or OPM. As you grow, key players on your team will be your investors. Whether you're looking to go down the venture capital road or wanting to raise equity from friends and family, you have to know how to sell. When it comes to raising capital for your business, potential investors are going to be looking at how you present it. Your ability to speak forcefully about your business and to overcome any objections—will determine your future.

Getting partners and deals through sales

Growing your partnerships in business is extremely important to your growth and success. For instance, if you are building a software product, it is key that you find ways to partner with other people for marketing and selling your product, as well as building integrations so that your software can work well with other software offerings out there. In many cases, over half the sales of a product can come from partners. You need good partners with whom you can make great deals that are mutually beneficial. In order to accomplish this, you need to have the skill set of sales. Partners, just like your employees and investors, will be buying into your mission and vision, as much as your financials. If you can't convince them to follow you, you're doomed to fail.

How to learn sales

When I was a young man graduating, I had two choices before me. I could get a secure job in the shipping industry or I could get a job with Xerox as a salesman. My poor dad begged me to take the secure job. My rich dad told me that if I wanted to really start my own business, I should work to learn—in this case learn how to sell. I took my rich dad's advice, and it was some of the best advice I've ever had. At first, I was a terrible salesman. I thought it would be easy because I had a business degree from a prestigious university. But I learned nothing about how sales really works in college. Xerox was the true graduate program I needed in how to sell and become an entrepreneur. By the end of my time at the company, I was the top salesman, but it took a lot of work and humility to get to that point.

If you want to be a successful business owner, today is the time to focus on building your sales skills. That might mean taking a job as a salesperson and working to learn. Or you could read books by people like Rich Dad Advisor Blair Singer, who is a master at sales.

So, get selling.

Summary

Robert Kiyosaki believes that the primary predictor of a successful entrepreneur is his/her ability to sell which cannot be taught in colleges and by highly paid executives of top firms. In order to scale your firm, you need to hire top employees for every vertical and in order to able to convince them to join your firm, you need to sell the idea of your firm, the roadmap of success of your firm. It is also possible to acquire investors (who'll invest their money in your firm), partners (who'll help in growing your firm) and crack tough deals via the art of selling. Thus, selling is the most important aspect to master if you plan to become a successful entrepreneur.

Key Learnings

- Mind-set of an entrepreneur and a highly paid employee is different - The top paying executives of any establishment in the world are essentially highly paid employees. They have knowledge of their own domain and may excel in their area of expertise. They are highly capable of managing the business. But will they be able to establish and scale a start-up is up for debate. An entrepreneur is driven by passion for his/her idea and they may falter many times, but by evaluating and learning continuously, they can become effective business executives on their own right

- Sales: An Art form - No course of entrepreneurship in the world will teach you how to sell. It's a hands-on experience which you get only when you become a salesperson. In order to become an entrepreneur, it is important to learn how to sell, not just your product, but your idea, your plan of action and your beliefs. It is through this ability will you be able to attract potential partners, employees and clients. So look at the profile of a salesperson as a stepping stone to becoming a successful entrepreneur.

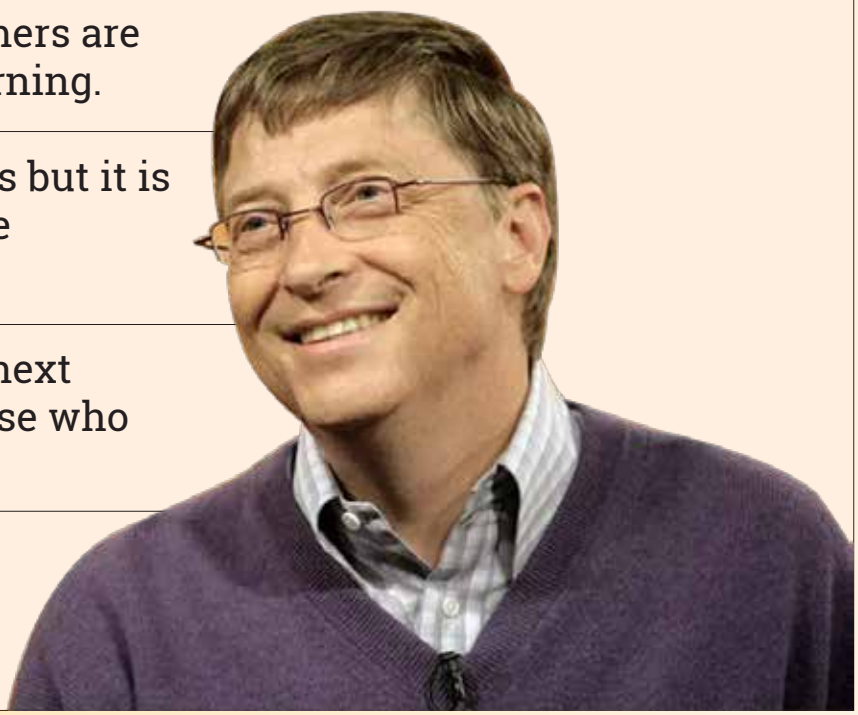

Management Quotes - Bill Gates

- Your most unhappy customers are your greatest source of learning.

- It's fine to celebrate success but it is more important to heed the lessons of failure.

- As we look ahead into the next century, leaders will be those who empower others.

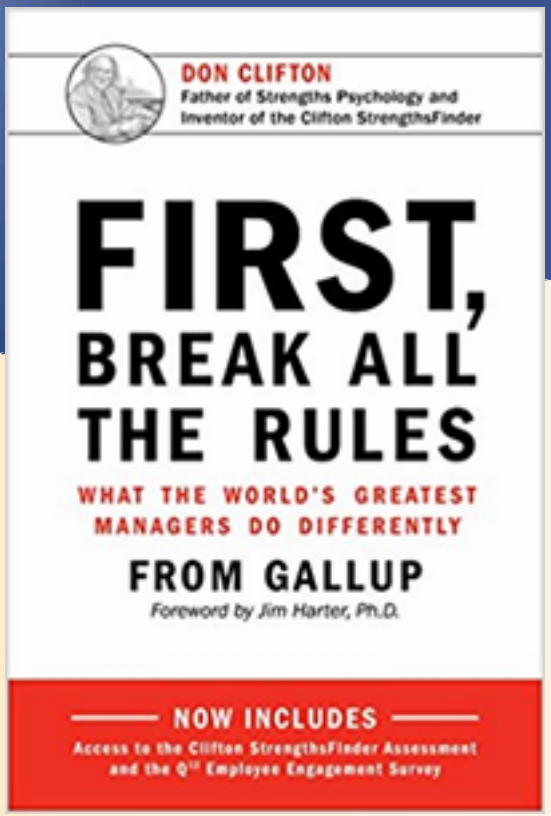

- If you can't make it good, at least make it look good.

"First, Break All The Rules"

by Marcus Buckingham

Gallup Organization

Marcus Buckingham is a British author, motivational speaker and business consultant. Building on nearly two decades of experience as a Senior Researcher at Gallup Organization, he currently guides the vision of ADP Research Institute as Co- Head and Talent Expert. He founded The Marcus Buckingham Company in 2006 with a clear mission: to instigate a "strengths revolution." It started with the idea that when people spend the majority of each day on the job using their greatest talents and engaged in their favourite tasks, basically doing exactly what they want to do, both they and their organizations will win. He is a global researcher and thought leader focused on unlocking strengths, increasing performance and pioneering the future of how people work

Summary

Based on in-depth interviews with more than 80,000 managers at all levels (and in companies of all sizes), the Gallup Organization's Buckingham and Coffman reveal in this book what great managers do differently from ordinary managers to obtain world class performance out of their workers. Great managers, routinely break all the rules. They take the conventional wisdom about human nature and managing people and turn it upside down. You will learn the four keys for unlocking the potential of each and every one of your employees.

- The first key is to select employees based on talent rather than experience or intelligence.
- The second key is to evaluate performance based on desired outcomes rather than direct control over the way a worker performs his or her job.
- The third key to great management is to reject the conventional wisdom that people can be fixed. Focus on strength, the authors urge, not on weaknesses.
- The fourth and final key is to find the right fit for your employees' talents.

Key Learnings

As the book explains about how managers are the driving force of any company and enable to create a strong workplace, we have listed down certain practices and routines that will ensure how to recruit, keep hold of and reward top performers

- Selection for talent - Exceptional managers recognize that talent is something everyone possesses in varying degrees. They understand that every role performed with excellence requires talent, because every role requires certain recurring patterns of thought, feelings or behaviour. Thus, talent is far more important than experience, brainpower or will power. The key is for managers to help each employee cultivate his talents by finding him a role that plays to those talents.

- Defining the right outcomes - The dilemma for managers is that they know they can't change much about an individual and that they must focus people on performance. They define the outcome and let each person find his or her own way to it. Each person can reach the outcome by the route most comfortable for him or her, and each worker takes responsibility for the solution. In the end, by focusing on outcome, employees will become more self-reliant and self-aware.

- Developing employee strengths - Great managers ignore the conventional wisdom that says management's job is to identify worker weaknesses and devise a plan to correct and overcome those weaknesses. Instead, they operate on the assumption that people don't and probably can't change many of the traits they carry. They recognize the futility in demanding change and concentrate instead on developing employee strengths.

- Accepting uniqueness - Great managers look inward, inside the company, into the individual, into the differences in style, goals, needs and motivations of each person. They then find the right way to release each person's unique talents into great performance.

- Finding the right fit - Great managers make sure that his employees are in roles that fit. He always steers workers toward roles that create the greatest chance for success. The problem with conventional wisdom is that promotion to the next level is seen as inevitable, desirable and the only way to get ahead. It doesn't have to be that way. To ensure this, companies can design systems that reward people who climb the ladder and those who don't. Only when there are opportunities for more prestige and more money at the present level will the allure of the corporate ladder lose its pull. And only then will workers find that they haven't been promoted into roles that don't fit.

- Routine Practices - To successfully practice the above mentioned rules, great managers develop a routine for performance management that displays four characteristics:

  → Simplicity - Great managers don't use complicated appraisal systems. Instead, they concentrate on what to tell each employee and how to tell them.

  → Frequent interaction - Great managers also frequently interact with each worker, not just once a year at review time. The interaction doesn't have to last long, but it must focus on performance. One clear advantage to frequent feedback is that poor performance can be corrected earlier rather than be left for a "bombshell" discussion at annual review time.

  → Focus on the future - All reviews should focus on the future. Great managers ask workers to identify where they want to go and how they are going to go about getting there.

  → Self-tracking - Great managers also ask workers to track their own performance and write down successes, goals and discoveries throughout the review period.

"Talent is the multiplier. The more energy and attention you invest in it, the greater the yield. The time you spend with your best is, quite simply, your most productive time." — Marcus Buckingham
